Classic and modern art furnished the inspiration for the bride's gown, and the dresses that her attendants wore Charles Dana Gibson, the artist, who is her brother-in-law, did not want the costumes to look as though they had been made, or to show a lot of needle work and fussing.

The lines, the Murillo-like drapings, were the "cachet" and charm of the cos umes, which were really the simplest hings imaginable, but their very plicity was complicated, for on the frocks of the bride's attendants not a stitch of sewing was visible, except the hemstitched edge of the material. Soft white satin charmeuse was used for Miss Langhorne's gown. The bodice was draped in such a way as to leave a V-opening at the throat, where folds of tulle were laid in surplice effect. There with which sprays of orange bloss
